In 2021, the Federal Reserve maintained the position that inflation was transitory and kept the Federal Funds Rate (FFR) at 0.25%. However, by February 2022, the Fed recognized its mistake and began a series of rate hikes, totaling 5.25% over the following 18 months. This shift led to an upward movement in the U.S. Treasury yield curve (see chart below). As a result, both equity and bond investors experienced double-digit losses in 2022, largely due to the Fed's policy missteps.

ALLOCATION

In the third quarter of 2023, the Fed finally began the process of reducing interest rates by 50 basis points, which led to a significant increase in bond yields. The Fed is expected to make another rate cut, potentially one more, in 2024. While the Fed has begun cutting rates, the U.S. economy remains strong, which raises concerns that inflation could resurface.

The Fund has benefited significantly in Q3 from these developments and is poised to continue benefiting as the Fed pursues further rate cuts.
